

Lange's treatment of Cochiti and its people reflects patience, a deep understanding, and sympathy. All of the Pueblo tribes deserve similar dedicated attention, not only for the insights we may gain concerning the rise of Stone Age sedentary civilizations, but because they are also a part of the American story, a part that one day may vanish along with the passenger pigeon and the American bison. The people of Cochiti have no skill desired by modern societies, as have the Iroquois of New York. They are, however, of a similar cultural level. Much can be learned of ancient man by observing these and other "primitive" cultures that still exist. Man, whether ancient or modern, can never be a totally dull subject.
